Remarks	[2026-11-09 12:33:03] DENIED by arturo: One of the fundamental principles of Montessori education is that the Environment should be designed around the child, not the adult. Furniture, materials, and everyday resources should be accessible to children, encouraging independence, confidence, and self-reliance. The new water dispenser was intentionally installed at the children's height so they can learn to recognize when they are thirsty, serve themselves water, and meet their own needs without constantly depending on an adult. This simple daily activity represents something much greater: the development of independence, responsibility, coordination, and self-confidence. It reflects one of the most beautiful principles of Montessori education: "Help me to do it myself." Our responsibility as Montessori Guides is not to do everything for the children, but to prepare an Environment where they can discover what they are capable of doing on their own. Of course, appropriate supervision and guidance remain essential, but accessibility and independence should always be at the heart of our decisions when preparing the Environment.
